

Ana Paula Barreto

Ana Paula Barreto (she/hers) is a Program Director for AfroResistance in New York. She has a masters of Arts in International affairs and is a 2018 fellow of the United Nations Fellowship Program for People of African descent. Ana is a researcher on racial justice, global health and inequalities with special focus on women and girls of African descent.

Ana has more than fifteen years of experience as a human rights professional, working in several counties of the Americas and Africa, doing innovative work on global health and reproductive justice. In 2018, she developed a project analyzing the intersection between economic empowerment and health outcomes of women and children in Ethiopia as well as the first “Black Brazilian Film Festival” in the African continent.

She is the co-founder of Projeto 111, a project that teaches young people in the favelas of Brazil how to use media tools to tell their own stories and disrupt police brutality through storytelling and the co-founder of Kilomba, the first Black Brazilian women collective in the United States.