

Supporting and creating targeted investment instruments for the diaspora can spur innovative supply chain activations and new secondary markets for development. For instance, despite Switzerland lacking cocoa plantations, it boasts top-quality chocolate sourced primarily from West Africa, particularly Cote d'Ivoire. This underscores the need for a thorough review of supply chain commodities markets. Leveraging available data, we must propose, discuss, and implement innovative supply chain structures and financial mechanisms.

Restorative justice models that work are available. We have the incredible work from Evanston, Illinois, and the state of California which provide phenomenal blueprint on how to formulate, educate, and execute such policies and programs. This moves restorative justice to a place of reality. WE MUST USE these frameworks and models globally.

All global policy initiatives, particularly on racism, equity, and restorative justice, should be rooted in a personal, local, and/or regional contexts for short- and long-term solutions. Clear and precise targets ensure programs and policies have a framework for greater impact and success.
